Everyone carries money stress—and employees carry it right into work with them.

In a recent PwC survey of full-time US workers, 63% of employees stressed about their personal finances. 45% of employees stressed about their personal finances during work hours.

When employees are stressed about their home finances, they’re more likely to be distracted at work and jump ship for higher pay at the drop of a hat.

You might feel powerless as an employer, but you don’t have to.

We did a survey of 3,000 full-time workers who had a whole different approach to financial wellness.

What makes them different? Are they just richer than the rest of us? No. They treat money differently than most people. They work for their paycheck, and then they make their paycheck work for them. They budget with YNAB.

When your employees feel financially stable, it matters to your bottom line. They’re more engaged. They’re more productive. They’re less likely to leave for the talent war.
